The whole structure is best studied by means of longitudinal sections, which are easily made with a razor, after a little practice, without any previous preparation of the specimen. Examining such sections under the microscope, if we chance to have selected a male specimen we shall find antheridia in great numbers growing at the apex of the axis, and with them slender, filamentous bodies, paraphyses, while outside of both is the circle of perichaetial leaves. The antheridia are sacs, usually oblong in shape, with a wall consisting of a single layer of cells, the interior being composed of the mother cells of the antherozoids. The latter are ciliated, protoplasmic bodies, closely resembling those of the ferns. In the examination of a female specimen the paraphyses are seen as before, but archegonia take the place of antheridia. A fully formed archegonium is...
