Not illustrated. 1876 Excerpt: .while the brother and sister slept sweetly in the house, the dwarf stood outside in the dark. If you had seen him, you would have thought that he was only a little man with rather a large head and a funny cap on; but he was an elf, who lived in the mountain, and he now took a little silver whistle from his pocket and gave a long and distinct signal, which could be heard far away. He had scarcely ceased whistling, when suddenly a great many little people just like him stood by his side, as if they had sprung from the ground, and asked him what he wanted of them; for he was their chief, and he told them his wish. Then they began to dig, and shovel, and carry loads, and soon the little house and garden with its bench under the linden-tree stood on the top of the hill, as if it had always been there. When the day dawned, the elves went back to their caves in the mountains, but the dwarf who had slept in the house of the kind brother and sister, went in to wake them with pleasant words, and then took them to the open window. Then the children saw that their house was really standing on the hill, that the river was flowing far down in the valley, and a beautiful linden-tree shaded the cottage. The little man then said good bye to them and departed....
