Not illustrated. 1857 Excerpt: .state through life. 3. In all the land vertebrata, however, a firmer skeleton is required, and the greater part of the cartilaginous skeleton therefore becomes replaced by bone; while equally firm bones are at the same time developed from the softer blastema before described. Thus there appears to be no necessity for cartilage as a matrix for the development of bone, unless required on account of its greater firmness; and Meyer s assumption that everything in which bone is formed is cartilage, is both a begging of the question, and, at the same time, incorrect. 3. The manner of development of bone is, however, essentially the same, whether cartilage or a soft blastema be the matrix. In both cases it is developed as an entirely new tissue, and the pre-existing. tissue disappears and gives place to it. It has been seen that the true osseous tissue...
